Popatopolis is a short documentary about Jim Wynorski, one of the most prolific Hollywood directors you've never heard of. Jim, famous for shooting feature films inside of 3 days, screaming at actors and crew, and being an all around brash, vulgar character, specializes in direct-to-video action and Cinemax style low-budget films. Far from being a simple chronicle of a 3-day shoot on a budget of $3000, Popatopolis is in fact an investigation of a character with whom we can all identify: A character who appears far more powerful than he is, and cowers in the face of conflict. It's about a man with true talent, lured by fear into complacency and simple goals.

He came to America with high aspirations and in his eight years stateside, he has landed a six-figure income and built his American dream from scratch. His wife, Malini, who came with him from India is a domestic goddess who supports the dreams of Senthilkumar but still clings to many of the Indian-born traditions. Her primary concern is the security and happiness of her daughter, Riththika. Riththika is a sweetly spoiled, precocious 6-year old who is bilingual, bicultural, and very active. Everything appears ideal within Senthilkumar's family. The Kumars are living the American dream. They have it all - a beautiful daughter, a lovely home and peaceful lives. Little did they expect that when Theodore Robertson entered their lives that everything they believed was theirs would no longer be true.
